

GoPro - Digital Video System

GoPro had their Hero video camera on display at the back of the Interbike show. It was quite the interactive and audio visual display back there with their staff modeling the different versions of the camera and on screen footage showing the camera in action.

The Hero camera system is a 5 megapixel sensor that can shoot 56 minutes of video and 5MP of photos using a 2GB SD card (not included). It is self contained in a small waterproof polycarbonate housing and weighs a mere 4.7 ounces. It uses 2 AAA batteries and comes with 16MB of internal storage.

walked by this booth and what did I see but my local trails being blasted on two huge flat screens. granted they were only two squares of six (i think it was six) but it was freaking awesome to see pac-town trails at interbike.

only thing, the riders in the video really need to hit ender to the wall ride, two of the coolest features there, yet they were passed by in for the video. 😞

the vid was good quality though, totally want one of these little things

My buddy Andrew and I have used these cams on our local trails. they are ok for the price, but can sometimes be kind of strobey. Also, on rocky descents, there is A LOT of giggle in the frame. i'd say that they are probably better for \smooth\ sports like snowboarding, where there's less vibration.

They have a couple of models such as the Motorsports Hero ($199.99), the Wrist Hero ($139.99) and the Helmet Hero Wide ($189.99). The Helmet Hero Wide is the one most applicable to mountain bikers. They just added a 170 degree wide angle lens so you will get more of the trail in the video, hence the Helmet Hero Wide name.

In addition there is a couple of interesting options to let you attach the camera to the handlebars or seatpost (the Ride Hero $19.99) and the latest option is a chest mount (the Chesty $29.99) which might work really well for the rough terrain on a mountain bike where your helmet is bouncing around.

This guy reminded me of Tony Robbins, he really worked the crowd and loved what he is doing and it shows.
